We present a case of endophthalmitis following endoscopic sinus surgery in an adult patient. The visual prognosis was good, with a visual acuity of 20/60 at the time of reporting. Pyogenic endophthalmitis after endoscopic sinus surgery has not previously been reported. I've just started using cookies. I've noticed a lot of sites store the passwords in cookies. I was wondering: is it safe to do so? A: Storing passwords in cookies is safe, as long as the cookie is properly encrypted. That being said, storing passwords in the browser's memory or in any kind of store on the user's disk are not safe. Your data is most probably very vulnerable to users and to malware. A: It is safe as long as you remember to set the cookie expires to at least one year. If the cookie doesn't expire then it will be stored for the current session and then removed when the browser is closed. Also, it will be a breeze to bypass by a page scraper that uses useragent sniffing to see what browsers are being used. A: The only problem with storing passwords in cookies is that user can see them when he logs in. You can however make it not visible by setting the remember:off; in your browser options.
