Q: Is it dangerous to make a new connection to a Amazon DynamoDB table on each application request? Is it dangerous to make a new connection to a Amazon DynamoDB table on each application request? For instance, I have a worker, which creates a table, starts a goroutine listening to the table with a prefix, and then it asks the database to get some data. This goroutine will be receiving data updates from a queue and processing them in the order that they were received. Is the goroutine considered safe from a connection point of view? Is there some sort of chaos that can happen if I have more than one connection to DynamoDB, or does the DynamoDB docs consider such a case safe? A: DynamoDB's distributed document-oriented NoSQL datastore is designed for scalability and fault tolerance. The operations at the API level are partitioned, which helps scale across multiple instances. The specification doesn't specifically state how many clients may access a table at a time, but the default number is 1. Further, it uses a client version lock (the GET request parameter tag) to be sure to only have a single version of the document, preventing multithreaded read operations. Finally, it is asynchronous, so there is no blocking waiting for a response. The client calls the Amazon API, and then it passes the response data directly to the calling goroutine. There is no conversation between client and server that can cause connection failures. In general, when dealing with distributed NoSQL datastores there is a scaling trade-off between speed and reliability. This one is particularly easy to implement as you are adding only one communication channel between client and server. Q: Match all text in string (Regex) I can use this line to replace all words (separated by space) in text with one character: `text=text.replaceAll("\\w+", "@").trim()` If I have large amount of text
