Several studies have recently shown that phenols (phenols are antioxidants found in fruits and vegetables) are capable of causing detrimental effects to seminal parameters. The aim of this study was to verify the presence of several phenol components in semen and to investigate the potential effects of phenol consumption on seminal parameters in healthy non-smoking men. To this end, 112 men of reproductive age were asked to complete a standardized questionnaire. They were asked about their dietary habits and phenol consumption. Semen samples were collected and analysed for concentration and quality. Additionally, chemiluminescent determinations for phenol, resorcinol, o-cresol, p-cresol and protocatechuic acid (PCA) were carried out. The analysis of variance showed that there is no significant relationship between total phenol intake (mean intakes of phenol, resorcinol and o-cresol) and seminal parameters. Q: Max Q - communication network performance I've heard about the "Max Q" problem for multiple servers in a communication network, where more than one node is trying to transmit data. A straightforward solution would be to reduce the time between transmissions for each node, but this obviously causes latency on each node. Is there a solution to this problem, which takes latency into account and avoids the "multiplication of transmission time" situation? A: The problem with max-q is that if the nodes request their transmit windows at the same time, then no node will win the transmission slot. The nodes will just have to be smart enough to not request their slot at exactly the same time. I suppose that is possible. However, when you have a dynamic channel access scheme, you also need to consider the propagation delay. Which nodes are in range may change, depending on how the radio signal is spread. The problem then changes to when to request your slot in the first place. A possible solution is to schedule the transmit slots such that the nodes are in range of each other at the same time. Q: Should I prefer a standard SQL library over ORM's? I am a beginner with SQL so
