What's new:

The Zero-G Revolution (ZERO-G Revoluție) was a Romanian struggle for a socialist revolution in the years following 1989, with proletarian activists and anticapitalist tendencies in the political atmosphere created by the aftermath of Ceaușescu's fall from power in December 1989. It was heralded by a succession of flash mob actions, which were in turn countered by the immediate formation of self-built "socialist" governments, the pro-Ceaușism of the National Salvation Front (FSN), as well as by the start of a nationalist campaign against the "gothic-hippy" lifestyle through the organization of the Francophile movement and the more aggressive movement of Libertatea. It also marked an increasing alternation of political and social dissidence in Romania. According to economic statistics, 2006 was the best year for the Romanian economy since its unification in 1918. The country is passing through a dispute over naming and uses two names for the same country with two different treaty boundaries with Moldova. Following the Zero-G Revolution in 1989, the following stories make up what began as a "humble protest" led by a group of students at the Polytechnic University of Timișoara, an important (Romanian) center of communist power and influence: The first protest, a flash mob of a few hundred people on the night of December 20-21, accompanied by a van on a loudspeaker, caused an "excellent surprise" in Timișoara, as noted in the newspaper Gazeta de Cluj. On the fourth day after the uprising, a group of cement workers (, literally means "workers of roadbuilding") without affiliation to any particular political party (claimed to be socialist) protested Ceaușescu's authoritarian regime with a demonstration on liberty, unity and peace (). Initiated in the Pușcău neighborhood of Timișoara, it quickly became a carnival-like event through tens of thousands of ad hoc participants, occupying at least a third of the city, as a parallel event to the demonstration of the Polytechnic University students during the night of December 20-21. The site of this event, called țândărică (I'm so hungry), where the poor were offered free food, was also likely the site of the first demonstrations against Ceaușescu, led
