Firefox and Google Chrome browsers launched new versions of their web browsers on Friday, Oct. 25, the first fruits of months of work at the companies that succeeded in bringing their market-leading browsers back from the brink of disaster. Browser updates, slated to be the most-discussed software release of the day, came to the scene on Black Friday in the United States, the day after the Columbus Day holiday in the US. By the end of the day, both Mozilla and Google had posted brief notes on their respective blog sites with the news. Mozilla, a company that had been almost bankrupt just a year ago, was hit hard by a security hole in Mozilla Firefox, dubbed "bug 432351" by Mozilla developers, that was publicly exposed by Internet security expert Harry Hurley in late September. Hurley called for a boycott of the browser, and one by the security community that used it to surf the web, resulted in Mozilla announcing the end of version 3.6 of Firefox. The Firefox browser was subsequently relaunched, this time with new features like tabbed browsing, improved password management and the addition of a new user interface. Google, on the other hand, had a less controversial patch to release. Users of the Chrome browser faced a regression, as Google inadvertently removed the pop-up blockers that were enabled by default in the version released just a few days earlier. Google has since been offering a new version of Chrome for testing that re-enables the feature, which was disabled in Chrome 8 as a "pre-activation". Although the two companies touted their new and stable browsers as the browser that is "simply better", the browser features in each are very few. Mozilla announced that Firefox version 3.7 is slated to be released in mid-November, with more features coming out in future updates. Version 3.7 will bring better support for video in Flash-based web sites, though that may also break some of them. Google Chrome 3.0, meanwhile, is not slated to be included in the next version of Windows that ships with Internet Explorer 9, though it is slated to be included in a future release of Windows. Version 3.0 also brings support for asynchronous WebSocket connections, but does not support the socket.io messaging protocol, something the company has been touting as a feature it would keep adding in future updates. The Chrome version currently shipping with Windows, version 3.0

Dec 24, 2009 Dec 24, 2009 I spent the morning baking in the sun, gazing at the passing scenery, enjoying people-watching, creating a cake and talking to the vendor who sells buffalo milk shakes. In the afternoon, with the sun setting, I went to eat calamari in one of those little booths and took in the sunsets. Lately, I spend a lot of time thinking about how I spend my time and am realizing that I spend most of it in front of my computer and, oh yeah, reading blogs. I'm just really beginning to understand how much time we spend working and how little we do living, and that I'm still not really good at it. It's been a bit of a rough year with work, and it's taking a toll on me. I'm trying to be kind to myself, say no to a lot of projects and say yes to things that make me happy. I'm figuring out what that looks like for me and just kind of watching what happens. There's this sense of unrest in me right now, and, oh yeah, the sun. There's just a lot of stuff and it has been a lot for me to deal with, and I'm letting go of some things and embracing others.
