The effects of food deprivation and sucrose pretreatment on passive immunization with antibodies against free fatty acids (FFA) were investigated in rats. Serum FFA concentrations were determined by radioimmunoassay (RIA). During fasting, immunization was performed after an overnight food deprivation (OD) for 24 h and on day 0, 16, 27 or 40. Only in the fasting group, immunized rats were more resistant to FFA than the non-immunized ones. In contrast, the rats with anti-FFA antibodies which were pretreated with 40% sucrose solution for 24 h showed no differences between the antibody-positive and antibody-negative groups with respect to FFA metabolism.The need for addressing a child's literacy and/or communication impairment by evaluating speech-language pathology and educational services in the school setting. This study was designed to answer the following questions: 1) What are the percentages of children with language and/or literacy difficulties who were referred to speech-language pathology (SLP) and/or speech-language-hearing (SLH) services, and 2) How often do SLP and/or SLH services provide the appropriate interventions? A convenience sample of 472 speech-language pathologists practicing in the United States was surveyed. Results from this study indicate that on average, 5% of children referred to SLP/SLH services have communication disorders, and a similar percentage have literacy skills that require special assistance. However, at least 58% of these children have not been evaluated by an SLP/SLH professional prior to referral and, for the majority of this group, their communication and/or literacy skills have been identified and documented by the school-based SLP/SLH team. A possible reason for this disconnect is lack of time on the part of school-based SLP/SLH team members. Implications for the future of the school-based SLP/SLH team are discussed. IkappaB activation contributes to intestinal inflammation in a model of experimental colitis. TNF and IL-1 are potentially pathogenetically important cytokines and are increased in patients with Crohn's disease. IkappaB kinase is an important signal transduction intermediate in pathways that transmit information from
